ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

The author wishes to express sincere appreciation to Dr. F. D. Blackley, Supervisor of the Project, for his guidance, assistance and encouragement during the preparation of this thesis.

Abstract.

This thesis contains a transcription and translation of two wardrobe account books of the household of Thomas of Brotherton and Edmund of Woodstock, the fifth and sixth sons of Edward I, preceded by a discussion relating to these books. They cover the periods February 15, 1305 - November 19, 1305 and September 20, 1310 - September 29, 1311.

The introduction gives a brief history of the lives of the two princes, a description of the function of the Wardrobe in general, and of the appearance, organization and contents of these books. The points discussed are the financial status of the household, its structure and size, and the day-to-day lives of the two boys.

Introduction

Thomas of Brotherton and Edmund of Woodstock, whose two household books are transcribed and translated in this thesis, were the fifth and sixth sons of Edward I and his first two children by his second wife, Margaret of France, whom he married in 1299. Thomas was born at Brotherton on June 1st, 1300, and Edmund at Woodstock on August 5th, 1301.

The household books, which cover the periods between February 15th, 1305, and November 19th, 1305, and September 30th, 1310, and September 29th, 1311, tell us very little about the princes. At the time when the first book was written Thomas was five and Edmund four; at the time when the second was written Thomas was ten and Edmund nine. The princes were too young for their personal tastes to be reflected in the expenses of their joint household.

As sons of a king, the princes at some point in their careers could expect to obtain titles of dignity, but throughout the books they are described simply as the lords Thomas and Edmund, the form of address given to male members of the royal family who had not yet been raised to the peerage. Thomas did become Earl of Norfolk and Earl Marshal of England in 1312 while Edmund was made Earl of Kent in 1321.

Both the young princes grew up to be men of weak and vacillating character but, being members of the royal family, they held positions of trust when they grew to manhood. Edmund in 1323 was made the king's lieutenant for England north of the Trent and was in charge of the English forces in the war of Saint-Sardos. In 1324 Edmund was appointed lieutenant in Aquitaine and the Agenais. In 1325 he was sent on a mission to Gascony. Thomas in 1319, during the absence of his half-brother Edward II, was Warden of England. In the summer of 1320 he accompanied Edward overseas. Despite these positions of trust the two brothers joined the forces of Queen Isabella and Roger Mortimer in 1326, when the Queen returned from abroad to overthrow her husband. Edmund in fact had accompanied Queen Isabella and her son Edward to France to the court of her brother Philip V of France. He landed in England with her party at Orwell, which incidentally was on the estates of Thomas of Brotherton. Both lords were among the group of nobles who condemned to death the elder Despenser, being rewarded with lavish grants from forfeited Despenser lands.

Edmund was appointed to the standing council to govern for Edward III, when Edward II lost his throne. Real power, however, was vested in Mortimer and Queen Isabella. Edmund soon became dissatisfied and joined the opposition group about Henry of Lancaster, but he deserted when he saw Lancaster's rebellion was doomed. Some time later, he joined a supposed plot to restore Edward II to the throne, a plot designed to provide evidence for a charge of treason to be levelled against him. Edward II of course was dead. Edmund was executed for his part in this plot in 1330.¹

Edmund's greatest claim to fame comes from his daughter, Joan of Kent, reputed as the most beautiful woman in England. Her second husband was Edward of Woodstock, the so-called Black Prince. She was the mother of King Richard II of England.

Thomas led a less eventful life than his brother. He did, however, execute many administrative and political commissions in 1327 and 1328. He and Edmund rode on either side of Queen Philippa, wife of Edward III, at her coronation in 1330. Thomas held the position of Commissioner of the Peace in many areas in the years following and was active in the King's service. Although his son was married to Mortimer's daughter, Mortimer's execution at Tyburn in November of 1330 was committed to his charge. Thomas died a natural death in 1338 and his daughter Margaret was his heiress.²

The household books of these two sons of Edward I are of interest in themselves as original documents hitherto untranslated. They are also of interest as two of the earliest surviving examples of household books prepared in a minor royal household.

Henry III was the first English king to set up a subordinate household with its own wardrobe for his queen, Eleanor of Provence.³ Edward of Caernarvon, the grandson of Henry III, and later Edward II, was the first royal child to be given a household of his own from infancy. Subordinate royal households with wardrobes for others than the queen or the heir to the throne followed. The separate household set up for Thomas and Edmund was an early example of what became soon the fashion. The wardrobe, which was the most important personal department in the King's household, was also the most important department in all subordinate households.

The basic function of the wardrobe was to record all household expenses and income as an office of account and receipt, and to prepare a yearly account book for the royal auditors. The two books are such accounts. The wardrobe was also the chief financial office and spending department of the household.

The principal official was the Keeper of the Wardrobe. He supervised the spending of all money and reported with his wardrobe books to the auditors of the King's household. His activities were rarely limited to purely mundane domestic matters and usually he was concerned with all aspects of the life of the household. Since this was so, wardrobe account books are a valuable source of information on the social life of the period with which they are concerned and often provide many items of general information of use to the political historian. From wardrobe books it is possible to reconstruct something of the organization and life of a medieval household with some insight, upon occasion, into the lives of the members of that household or their friends and relations.

The first of the two wardrobe books considered in this thesis is a small book of eight folios while the second consists of seventeen folios. Both are written upon vellum. The first is complete but the second lacks folios one and seventeen. I have not seen the originals, which are in the British Museum, and have worked from a microfilm obtained by Dr. F. D. Blackley.

The writing in both books is in the typical court hand of the period and, while very legible, for the most part is very small. In my opinion both books appear to have been written by the same person, except for the first few pages of the second, where the writing is slightly larger and more ornate.

The writer, particularly in the second volume, made a number of errors in the totals of money spent. These were corrected, either by himself or the auditors, and a new amount substituted in each case. I have given both these amounts in my transcription and have drawn a line through the first total as was done in the manuscripts.

Each page in the first book has been crossed out by a single vertical line indicating that it has been audited and entered into the King's accounts. The second book is not marked in such a manner; here proof of audit and re-entry is found in the underlining of totals and the use of the verb probatur after each underlined total. Both methods of account were popular with auditors in England at this time. The books would have been marked when they were presented by John of Claxton, the Keeper of the lord's wardrobe, for audit at the King's wardrobe, and the amounts entered into the wardrobe book of the King.

The arrangement of each of the books is similar to that of the royal wardrobe books of the period. The expenses are listed under various titles (tituli) such as "alms" or "necessaries", while each has its own individual marginal heading on the left-side of the folio. The description of the article purchased or given away, the service performed, etc., takes up the most of the entry, while the amount of money involved is written in the right-hand margin of the folio. The total for each page is entered at the bottom and, at the end of each title, the total amount involved under the complete heading is given.

In the first book are found the following titles and the amount of money expended:

Alms	£	6.18.10
Necessaries		72.09.02
Messengers		17.00
Gifts		12.13.04
Shoe Allowances		5.07.04
Clothes' Allowances		10.13.04
Knight's Fees		10.00.00
Great Wardrobe		174.09.02
Wages of the Household not allowed in the Household Roll		60.16.4-1/2
Total	£	354. 4.6-1/2
Household Expenses as shown in the Roll	£	510.14.11-1/2
Sum Total of all Expenses	£	864.19. 6

The auditors actually approved £ 354.4.7 for the sum total of wardrobe expenses and £ 864.19.19-1/2 as the sum total of all expenses, but were in error by 3-1/2d. Since the calculations were made in Latin numerals, the error is easily understandable.

The second book shows that the household had developed greatly. It now had its own assigned sources of income and the tituli are more numerous.

Household Roll	£	967.15.07
Alms		14.08.06
Necessaries		148.17.08
Gifts		24.02.00
Messengers		4.05.03
Robes		65.13.04
Shoes		6.13.00
Knight's Fees		13.06.08
Great Wardrobe		72.03.05
Foreign Prests		179.09.01
Sum Total of all Expenses	£	1496.14.06

The receipts of the household amounted to £1428.1.4 for the same period leaving a deficit of £ 68.13.02.

The amounts given above are the correct totals for the items listed. The total given in the wardrobe book itself, however, is £ 1497.14.6 for all expenses. There is again a small error in calculations but like the first the error is insignificant.

Household expenses of just under fifteen hundred pounds represent a large amount of money in the early fourteenth century. Economic historians inform us that there was a marked scarcity of actual coined money at this time, particularly towards the end of the reign of Edward I. Accounts written at this time do not deal with actual money changing hands; they reflect rather elaborate credit operations. This fact is apparent in the list of "Prests" given in the second book.

A "prest" was used to liquidate gradually all obligations; in fact a "prest" was an advance upon an account, either of wages owed or expenses allowed. "Prests" were given to various household officials and to various individuals outside the household itself. In the second book, most "prests" are given to persons connected with the administration of the estates of the lords. They are called "foreign prests" as they are not concerned with the running of the household proper.

Prices appear to have remained fairly stable within the period 1305 to 1311. The allowance for a yeoman's robe remained constant at 13s.4d., as did the price of shoes at 2s.4d. a pair and red wax at 1s.4d. a pound. Horses, a most expensive item, cost as much as £ 12, the price paid for one given to Walter Reynolds, the king's chancellor. Sweetmeats, an expensive luxury, were usually priced at 2s. a pound, apart from saffron which cost 8s. a pound. By comparison, miniver furs of seven tiers cost only £ 1.6.1d. However, even the cost of luxury items varied very little. No evidence of any inflation at this period can be found in these two books.

The totals of expenses in the second book when compared with those given in the first book reflect the fact that the lords Thomas and Edmund were no longer very little boys. In the first book their household was closely connected with that of their mother, Queen Margaret, and had no independent source of income. In the second book this was no longer the case. The lords possessed rights in their own names to lands and revenues, some granted by their father Edward I before his death in 1307 and others by their brother, Edward II. The household was larger with a greater scope although it had not changed greatly in its basic construction.

In the first book money payments for gifts, clothes and wages were all made directly by Thomas of Quarley, the cofferer of Queen Margaret. Walter Langton, the bishop of Chester (i.e. Coventry and Lichfield) and the king's Treasurer, was in frequent touch with the officials of the lords' household and brought money to the household and arranged for supplies. There are no receipts since the household subsisted upon grants.

On August 21st, 1306, however,⁴ Edward I pledged himself and his heirs to grant lands to the value of 10,000 marks a year to the lords Thomas and Edmund in accordance with the provisions for male children stipulated in the marriage treaty which Pope Boniface VIII drew up for the marriage of Edward I of England and Margaret of France. Thomas was pledged the lands of Robert Bigod, Earl of Norfolk and Earl Marshal of England, should Bigod die childless. The Bigod lands were officially valued at 7,000 marks a year. If those funds did not materialize, the missing amount, the remainder, was to be found in some other manner.

Roger Bigod did die childless in December, 1306, but it was not until December, 1312, that Thomas was made Earl of Norfolk and vested with the Bigod lands. On 18th July, 1310, however,⁶ Edward II granted to Thomas and Edmund for their maintenance all the Bigod lands which he held. The second book contains a payment to clerks hired from the King's chancery to transcribe the accounts of the Bigod manors in Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex and Berkshire. Included amongst the receipts in this book is one from Framlingham, the seat of the Bigod family. This shows that Thomas was receiving revenue from some, at least, of the Bigod lands by this time, but since receipts from the Bigod estates amounted to only £ 1428.1.9, either the value of these lands had been over estimated or not all of the lands were in the control of the lord Thomas.

Since the household ran at a deficit in the second book, we are forced to assume that the difference was made up with royal grants. William of Newport made many trips to the royal treasury during this period and he may have received the money necessary to balance the household budget at these times.

Receipts came from farms and from actual revenues received. A farm was a grant of some manor or office in return for which the recipient paid an annual guaranteed sum. People such as John Sandale, the king's treasurer, held farms of the lords. Revenues were money collected directly by the Keeper of the Lands.

A section in each of the household books deals with allowances for cloths, furs, silks and similar items issued to various members of the household. These allowances were made for special occasions, such as the great festivals of the Church. In the first book these are found under the title of "Great Wardrobe"; in the second book this title covers as well the purchase of various spices and the cost of transporting these to their destination.

During the reign of Henry III sub-departments began to emerge, within the royal wardrobe; the two most important of these being known as the Great Wardrobe and the Privy Wardrobe. The latter dealt with the personal expenses of the monarch.

No mention of a Privy Wardrobe is to be found in either of the two books. The purely personal expenses of the lords are found, amongst other expenditures, under the title of "Necessaries" (Necessaria). There was, however, as we have seen, a Great Wardrobe. The main purposes of this seems to have been to purchase dry goods (materials, spices etc.) and of other non-perishable items and to arrange for the transport and storage of these items.

Some of the lesser households of this period possessed an Exchequer, a Chamber and a Chancery, similar to those found in the royal administration. The Lords Edmund and Thomas had a Chamber but this was a purely domestic office and had no part in the general direction of their household. No trace can be found of an official Exchequer or a Chancery.

Some sort of writing department must have existed within the lords' household even though there was no formal Chancery. There is frequent mention in the accounts of red wax purchased to seal the letters of Edmund and Thomas. The household does not appear to have had its own seal; the lords themselves like all other nobles had their own personal seals and these may have been used to authenticate documents. The keeper of the household, on the other hand, may have used his seal for this purpose.

The wardrobe staff of the lords' household was made up of clerks under the direction of John of Claxton, the Keeper, aided by two deputies. These were his official deputy, Ambrose of Newburgh, who was known as the "Clerk of the Offices", the other was William of Newport, who looked after much of the payment of money.

John of Claxton held the office of Keeper in both books, and the major officials of the household were the same in the two periods covered by the accounts we possess. Claxton, sometimes called the Treasurer and once the Seneschal, supervised all Wardrobe activities and many of his concerns are found listed under "Necessaries". He was responsible for the collection of all the money due to the household and with receipts for this money. Often he was absent from the court of his lords on the business of their household. One can trace his journeys in entries - a trip to London to collect money from the King's Treasury and to get provisions; visits to manors to assess dilapidations, to consider possible improvements, and to supply men for repairs and improvements; a visit to London to pay for various commodities; trips to talk with the king's treasurer and chancellor and with some of the magnates assembled in parliament; a trip to the king's treasury for the audit of his accounts, etc. Even when away, as we can see from the entries under "Messengers", Claxton remained closely in touch with two other important officials of the young princes, the Steward of the Household, John of Weston, and the Keeper of the Lands, John of Thorpe.

John of Weston, the Steward, was in charge of the day to day running of the household. He authorized small payments to minstrels, the giving of alms to friars who held services for the good health of the princes, etc. These appear under the title of "Alms". His payments to messengers bringing news from far and near, such as the messenger of the Earl of Hereford, the brother-in-law of the lords Thomas and Edmund, announcing the birth of a daughter, are found under the title of "Gifts". Indeed, expenses within the household proper were his responsibility.

Weston spent a lifetime of service as a royal official.⁷ He was a knight in the household of the lord Henry, the eldest son of Edward I, who died in 1274. His son, John of Weston, junior, mentioned once in the second household book, was also in royal service and had been a knight in the household of Edward II, when he had been heir to the throne.

John of Thorpe, the Keeper of the Lands, figures prominently in the second book, but he does not appear in the first. As we have seen, when the first book was composed, the lords had no assigned revenues for their support. By 1311 the lords had a revenue of their own from a large number of manors which were the responsibility of the Keeper of the Lands.⁸ In this capacity, Thorpe lived outside the household travelling about to supervise the manors of his lords. Letters to Thorpe are generally sent "to withersoever he might be found."

Both John of Weston and John of Thorpe were knights. Weston, in both of the books, is noted as receiving an annual knight's fee from the lords and is included in the list of those of the household entitled to receive an allowance for robes and shoes. Thorpe is not in receipt of a knight's fee but he did get a fee of some sort. His name occurs in the list of "Prests" as receiving an advance against his fee. It is possible that his position was made attractive by perquisites; in the list of "Receipts" he paid a fee for the farm of the Cesteseys which, no doubt, he made to show a profit.

With manors to control, with the princes growing up, the household of the lords Thomas and Edmund faced responsibilities not found in the first of the household books. It is not surprising, therefore, that the second of the books refers to a council, a common feature of all households including those of the lesser barons. The council of the lords no doubt followed the model of such councils, which usually consisted of all the chief household officials (both lay and clerical) and sometimes of the more important retainers. A council of this sort was the place in which all important decisions relating to the household were made.

The wardrobe book for 1305 lists many women amongst the members of the household, a natural enough thing to expect when there were small boys needing care. The Lady Edeline de Venusse is noted as "Mistress of the Household" and as being in charge of the two lords with the help of various nurse maids and women assistants. A Lord Stephen de Venusse who is mentioned in the same book as being in receipt of a knight's fee may have been the husband of the Lady Edeline. We have no indication of what part this knight played in the household.

In the second wardrobe book all the women have departed with the exception of a washerwoman, whose name was Matilda. There is no trace, either, of the Lord Stephen de Venusse.

Under normal circumstances in the second book one would expect to find a tutor, or magister, for the lords. No one, however, is mentioned as occupying such a position. One might speculate that the knight Richard Boarhunt, had some part in the upbringing of the lords. Still, it must be remembered that Stephen de Venusse received a fee as a knight in the first wardrobe book and had no specified duties. Also, there is no sign of any purchase of books or of writing materials for the boys which they would have needed if they had been learning their letters.

A chaplain appears in both household books. There are always friars minor living within the household as well as a tailor, a cook, a chandler and many other domestic officials. The lists given show esquires and yeomen as well as many boys employed in the various offices. The household of the lords was of a fair size but its exact size at any given time is difficult to determine. However, forty-four people received allowances in the first book (many of whom were women) and fifty-five in the second. The lists of people receiving allowances for cloths and shoes did not necessarily include all people employed at all times in the household. Only permanent employees received such allowances and even those had to be present at the court of their lord or lords at the time of the actual issue.

As has been noted earlier, the characters, tastes, and activities of the lords do not emerge with any clarity from a study of their household books. In the first of the books we know from items under the heading of "Alms" that the young boys visited various shrines and made appropriate offerings in the company of their half-sister, Mary, a nun of Amesbury, who was twenty-seven years old at the time. Mary, it might be observed, was a great devotee of pilgrimages and might well have served as the model for Madame Eglentyne, the prioress of Chaucer.⁹ But this was conventional behaviour and may be dismissed as such.

Most of the people with whom the young princes had outside contacts were much older than they were. Mary, a frequent visitor, was, as we have seen, twenty-seven. Edward of Caernarvon, the heir to the throne, paid them visits, but he, though their half-brother, was also an adult. Walter Langton, the bishop of Chester, was no doubt welcome when he came frequently as a guest but he was hardly a playmate for the lords.

For a time, at least, they had a companion of a more suitable age. This was Margaret, the daughter of their half-sister Elizabeth, the Countess of Hereford. She is mentioned in 1305 when her yeoman received an allowance for robes and shoes. Margaret, however, died at an early age¹⁰. and it is doubtful that she was with her young uncles for any period of time.

In the second book we find that Edward Balliol,¹¹ the son of the deposed King of Scotland, John Balliol, was a member of the household of the lords. Edward II placed him with his half-brothers and gave them special payments for his expenses.

Perhaps their principal companions were members of their household; many of the esquires would be of noble birth and suitable as friends when the lords passed babyhood. At least Edmund, as is shown in the second book, played at draughts with John of Redmereslee. The only other purely personal item occurs in the first of the household books which, under the title of "Alms", records the payment of money for the drum of a certain Martin the Minstrel, which had been broken by the young princes.

One would expect that the young princes would spend some time with their parents. However, only once does the first book record that they spent a few days with the royal household. But both Edward I and Edward II seem to have had a great interest in the princes if one can judge by the letters sent to inquire as to their health.

Edmund is mentioned twice as being ill and two friars were maintained to pray for the good health of the princes. Many of the drugs mentioned amongst the household purchases were those used for sickness, but there is little evidence to speculate upon the general health of the princes. The only items mentioned as purchased for the personal pleasure of the princes are some candies given to Edmund when he was ill.

Indeed one would suppose that the princes had no personal possessions beyond their clothes were it not for one item noting a payment to a goldsmith for the repair of two gold clasps belonging to Edmund and the mention of a maplewood cup with a silver base along with a salt cellar, the personal property of Thomas. For the latter two wooden boxes were constructed and noted under the heading of "Necessaries".

Royal and noble households of this period were not stationary. That of the lords moved constantly, seldom staying in one place for longer than two or three months. During the six-months period recorded in the first book, they were in residence at Weston, Kennington, Banstead, Ludgershall, Westminster and Windsor; during the year recorded in the second book, they lived at Romsey, Oakbourne, Ludgershall, Hampstead, La Breche, Chelchurch and Westminster. When they moved, their whole household and its accoutrements moved with them and the changes were probably quite exciting for two small boys. Such travels were commonplace for the nobles at that time but it is interesting to note that guides were employed when the young lords went from Banstead to Ludgershall in 1305, a journey of seventeen days.

Footnotes

1. Mary, nun of Amesbury, was the sixth daughter of Edward I and the half-sister of Thomas and Edmund. She was born in 1278 and died in 1332. Green, Lives of the Princesses of England, II, 404-442.
2. The "Bishop of Chester" was the mediaeval colloquial form for the "Bishop of Coventry and Richfield." The office was held at this time by Walter Langton, the King's Treasurer.
3. 18th April C. R. Cheney ed., Handbook of Dates for Students of English History (London, 1945), p.138.
4. It is not clear which earl is being referred to.
5. Edward, Prince of Wales, later Edward II, half-brother of Thomas and Edmund.
6. Their half-sister Elizabeth was married to Humphrey de Bohun, Earl of Hereford and Essex. Her daughter Margaret was living in the boys' household at this time. Green, Lives of the Princesses of England, III, 40.
7. 24th June.
8. 40th day after Easter.
9. Probably Edward the Confessor - 13th October.
10. 1st November.
11. A farm was a grant of some manor or office in return for which the recipient paid an annual guaranteed sum.
12. Probably St. Michael the Archangel - 30th September.
13. Son of John Balliol, deposed King of Scotland. Edward later became King of Scotland himself. Had been placed in the boys' household for a time by Edward II. Lee, S. and L. Stephen eds., Dictionary of National Biography (London, 1908), I, 983-985.
14. Their half-sister Eleanor who died in 1298. She was the wife of the Duke of Brabant. Her remains were brought to England and buried in Westminster Abbey. Green, Lives of the Princesses of England, II, 315.

32. Margaret of France, second wife of Edward I, mother of Thomas and Edmund.
33. Husband of their deceased sister Eleanor.
34. The account for wax written in right-hand margin.
35. I have throughout translated the verb "tegere" as "to cover" as this is the most common translation of the word. In some cases in this text, however, "to wipe" would seem a better translation. *
36. Obviously this is some kind of accountrement for a horse but I am unable to find a translation for it.
37. "Sum 61 ells" is written in the right-hand margin with lines connecting it to the last two paragraphs.

* The word has now been changed to "tergere" in the text as it was decided at the oral that this must be the word. The translation has not been changed.
